Best-selling authors T. A. Barron and Tony DiTerlizzi know all about fanciful creatures and fairy-tale worlds. They follow different paths, however, to create mystical worlds for readers ages 9 – 12.

Barron is at the end of a journey. Today, the final edition of his Merlin's Dragon trilogy wraps up Barron's 11-book adventure series.

DiTerlizzi – co-author of The Spiderwick Chronicles – in September launched The Search for WondLa, the first book in his trilogy about a 12-year-old girl who flees her underground home to search for other humans.

Merlin and WondLa have caught the attention of producers, and movies are in the planning stages.

The authors will be at free events in Houston next week to talk about imagination, dragons and robots.

Their books about heroic young people are geared for a demographic that both authors love to talk with about life's possibilities and then hook as lifetime readers.

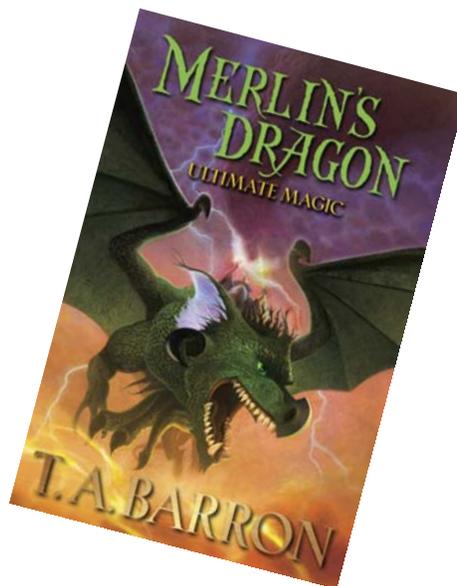

Merlin's Dragon: Ultimate Magic (Philomel, 240 pp., $19.99) is the culmination of 18 years of work, Barron said. In 1996, the first title in the five-book series – The Lost Years of Merlin – was published. Then came the The Great Tree of Avalon trilogy, followed by the Merlin's Dragon trilogy. A compendium, The Book of Merlin, is finished and due for publication in 2011.

"It's one complete world. That's the most fun part for me. It's got all these magical places and wondrous creatures and more than 100 characters and all these back stories and histories and complicated relationships," Barron said.

In Ultimate Magic, Merlin's sidekick Basil, the little fellow who becomes the greatest dragon of all time, leads the fight to save the people of Avalon.

In DiTerlizzi's The Search for WondLa (Simon & Schuster, 477 pp., $17.99), the heroine Eva (DiTerlizzi pronounces "EV-a") is styled as modern-day Alice Liddell of Alice's Adventures in Wonderland, Wendy Darling of Peter Pan and Dorothy of The Wizard of Oz. There are also some Star Wars influences, he said.

Twelve-year-old Eva Nine has lived isolated underground with mechanical caretakers when an invasion forces her above ground to fend for herself in a scary landscape on her quest to find a new home.

Drawings open WondLa's 42 chapters. An augmented reality element allows the reader to put designated illustrations up to a computer's webcam to follow Eva's journey on an interactive map.

While the authors have much in common, their work is quite different, and they have different approaches.

Here is what T. A. Barron said when asked how he creates his mystical characters:

"I always start with visualizing it. What does this creature or being or person look like? And then I go through all the five senses: What do they sound like, smell like, feel like, all of that.

"And then I ask a second level of questions. Which is: What is their daily life like? What would this creature do on a typical Tuesday? Does it live in a cave? Does it live in the air? Does it have a nest of babies? Is it an outcast from its society or the ruler of its people or ... a scribe who writes the history of its people?

"Then I get to the third and most interesting level. ... I need to know before I can write about them what are they really like deep down inside. What are their deepest, darkest fears? What are their highest hopes and aspirations? What are their dreams?

"And I also want to know a secret. Something down deep.

"So at the very, very end, at the bottomless bottom of level three, I ask: What is your deepest, darkest secret? And when the creature answers me with their own voice, I know I now know them well enough to make them come alive for my readers."
